CRYING FOR HELP. BEAUTIFUL OLD AGE

When trouble struck the grand old defy the inroads of time unless he conpatriarch Job, it hit him again and tinually associates with the young folks. again. First came financial trouble, "What would an engine be in a ship if then domestic trouble, then physical it were lying loose in the hull?" said moulde. It was pain in the head, pain in the heart, pain in the limbs, pain in the back and pain everywhere. Then what happened? Job tried to gain comfort from his reminiscences. Job comfort from his reminiscences. Job | community before he can work well for plest time of his life. He pictured him-screws and bolts as children." That is self when he was a young husband blanning and working for his future. There is no screw or bolt that holds man to the duties of life firmer planning and working for his future. He thought of himself when his young than the children. But I go even further than did Mr. Beecher. Daily association with young people, specially with children, is essential in many ways for a man's development. It keeps his heart young. Yes, it does more than that. Yet we find the strange fact that many men after they have made their success in one line of work as a rule are satisfied with that success, and because they are satisfied they begin to wither and shrivel up and gradually which comes from being satisfied with a past success cannot be better illus-trated than by some of the faculties of our old colleges. Now, the college faculties of both the east and the west were originally made up of picked men. The presidents and trustees of those institutions in almost every case seected the very brightest and best students of their classes. They were the honor men of the colleges who were nsked to fill the honored professorial chairs. But, marvelous to say, although the college faculties of the old institutions in my day had been recruited from the brightest men, yet almost without exception these faculties had a large percentage of men who seemed to be simple relics of the past.
